and Queen soon after they arrived at the Tuileries, and were very civil, which was something to raise their spirits. M. de la Fayette had a quarrel at the Marquis de Coigny's with the Duke d'Orleans. The latter came to the King, who accepted his submission, but requested him, for his own sake, to go to England, under the pretext of a special mission, with passports from the King and the Assembly. This he has done, and his astonished partisans have sent off to Boulogne to stop him and force him to return to Paris.

They say things are now becoming tranquil.

London, December xst, 1789.

I am just arrived, and so fatigued that it is impossible for me to set out for the north for several days. It will take me that time to recover. But though weak in body, I am happy in mind to be again in England, and so soon to see you all. One sad drawback is my having left Henry; but he is well and safe, receiving an excellent education, much loved by his master, and under the special care of Madame de Talaru and M. de Beauveau, who, on the very first appearance of danger, will send him directly to
